    - i. The group discussed redefining what a preservation tool is and had a dialogue to identify potential tools.
    - ii. Jean-Luc Pierite discussed how organizations will undertake preservation projects through another office like Arts & Culture because that office has a grant program or funding, and it means that people have to get creative with the routes they take to undertake preservation.
    - iii. The group discussed wanting to know how involved preservation is for projects that may be tourism-based but still a function of historic preservation or commemoration.

- iv. Lydia Lowe discussed community-based cultural assets and small/legacy businesses in Chinatown. - v. Margaret Dyson discussed how zoning regulates use and preservation regulates space, and there is a gap between space and use.
- vi. There was discussion around Main Streets because it started as a preservation tool and is now useful for business interests and foot traffic.
- vii. Margaret Dyson asked: things people wish they could do, things they wish had a regulation or incentive program for, and what are the things that need to be identified to create that resolve an articulated need.
